

THE AVALANCHE HAZARD WILL BE LOWAvalanche Hazard Forecast for Sunday 06/03/2022*Avalanche Problems*Wet Snow*Cornices*Forecast Snow Stability & Avalanche Hazard

The existing snowpack which is mainly on North, though East to South-East aspects will remain firm, well bonded and stable above 750 metres. Some surface softening will occur where the snowpack is exposed to the direct sunshine and later in the afternoon at lower levels as the freezing level begins to rise. Any remaining cornices will also soften later in the period and become fragile and unstable. The avalanche hazard will be Low.

Forecast Weather Influences

The light North-Westerly winds will veer Easterly becoming South-Easterly tonight, then gradually gain in strength to become fresh South-South-West. No precipitation is forecast. The freezing level will remain around 700 meters overnight, rising later in the period to around 900 metres.

Comments

Remaining dry with clear or sunny spells. S or SSE winds strengthening.

View the latest avalanche report

Scan the QR code to view the full Avalanche Hazard Report on the SAIS website.