

THE AVALANCHE HAZARD WILL BE LOWAvalanche Hazard Forecast for Wednesday 15/02/2023*Avalanche Problems*Wind Slab*Forecast Snow Stability & Avalanche Hazard

Through the day, isolated areas of windslab will form on steep wind sheltered terrain, mainly above 800 metres on North to East aspects, Accumulations are not expected to be significant and will generally be avoidable. Elsewhere, there will be a dusting of new snow and the patchy old snow will refreeze, becoming firm at summit levels. The avalanche hazard will be Low.

Forecast Weather Influences

As the freezing level lowers to around 800 metres by daybreak, summit snow, preceded by light rain, is expected pre-dawn, turning to wintry showers later. Southerly gales overnight will briefly ease in the early hours, becoming fresh to strong South-Westerly through the afternoon.

Comments

The hills will look a bit more wintry Wednesday morning. Freezing around summit levels on Thursday, but mild again overnight Thursday.

View the latest avalanche report

Scan the QR code to view the full Avalanche Hazard Report on the SAIS website.